PART II. ARCHITECTURAL INFORMATION

This outbuilding is one of a similar pair placed symmetrically south of the plantation house. It is of stucco on brick, one story in height, 20'-6" by 26'-6" in plan, with a flat roof. The foundations are low, terminating in a plain water table. Walls are marked off with simulated stone jointing; at each corner there is a pilaster strip. One long side (toward the main axis of the house, and parallel to it) contains two rectangular door openings, without trim, with four-panel doors. The other long side contains two rectangular windows. At each end there is a window between a pair of pilaster strips. Sash are double hung, six lights over six lights, provided on the outside with louvered shutters. At the top of the wall is a slightly projecting plain frieze, above which are a moulded cornice of slight projection and a low parapet. At each end the parapet is treated with a projecting block having a low "gabled" upper edge. A chimney projects above the center of the roof.

The interior is divided into two rooms of slightly different size by a transverse partition; a fireplace projects from the center of this partition into the larger room. A doorway at one side of the fireplace connects the two rooms.

The two outbuildings are placed south of the plantation house, symmetrically about the main (north-south) axis, with their long dimension north and south. They appear to be in good condition, and are undergoing minor repairs as of this date.
